

Abstract

Even though, it has been accepted that free quarks do not exist in the nature and they are confined in the mesonic and baryonic states, but still no one knows the mechanism which does not let them exist freely or in a color non singlet state.

In this talk, some phenomenological models and numerical methods which try to describe the confinement will be discussed.